In Celebration of Light

Let in the light.

Let in that souvenir of a late night's dining room, gladly crowded. The warm glow on the wood-paneled walls, the delighted laughter from friends pressed together around a well-set table, gently connecting over a shared meal.

All the stories of our lives unfold at the pace of light. It punctuates, points out, is a partner throughout our existence. It draws the distinctive, discreet lines of shadows. It helps us distinguish dark from bright, cold from warm, night from day. It changes over seasons: The golden rays of an indian summer indolently turning into blue and greyish winter lands, all longing for spring to shiver through under a frail, shimmering sky.

Light affects how we feel, how we rest, how we work, how we love, how we gather.

Light is our constant companion, whether we notice it or not. It is what we share, what we all strive for. Without light, no warmth. Without light, no joy. Without light, we are lost. Light is the most essential thing of living. And we are here to celebrate it.
